

Social Researcher - Ontario Public Interest Research Group Kingston

About OPIRG Kingston

OPIRG (Ontario Public Interest Research Group) Kingston is a local, student-directed, and community-minded group focused on social and environmental justice. We strive to create meaningful transformative change to benefit our local Queen's University and Kingston communities by facilitating education, research, and action for pertinent issues.

For over 30 years, we have initiated and/or supported numerous community groups/projects, such as ReelOut Queer Film Festival and Queen's Backing Action on the Climate Crisis; organized inclusive programming; empowered and educated students to take action on various topics; and facilitated connections between student and non-student community members. We offer various kinds of support to local activists, including information, funding, and administrative functions.

Much of our programming is educational in nature: we bring diverse scholars and activists to host talks; host reading and discussion groups on various topics such as allyship and solidarity; screen films; and give workshops.

We hold weekly office hours and queer and trans co-working sessions. Our office is meant to be a space for student and non-student community members to connect on matters of social and environmental justice, bring up issues they care about, vent, engage in conversation, and learn amongst each other.

Our current working groups include Mutual Aid Gardens (volunteer-run gardens that distribute free produce), Roots & Wings (social justice group offering workshops for racialized youth), Umbrella Academy (transgender advocacy association), the Gender Affirming Assistance Project (supports Two-Spirit, trans, non-binary and gender diverse community members), the Queer Muslim Resistance podcast (social justice conversations from queer Muslim perspectives), and Cinema Politica OPIRG Kingston (independent, political film screenings about social and environmental justice issues).

Job description and application details

The stories of people who participated in struggles for social and environmental justice - queer, Indigenous, Black, anti-racist, feminist, among many others - often go untold or hidden in our community and campus stories. OPIRG Kingston seeks to remedy these silences by recording, sharing, and celebrating Kingston and Queen's University's rich histories of social movements and resistance in our People's History Project.

The Social Researcher will seek to recognize, preserve and share local histories of oppression, resistance and liberation by building on OPIRG Kingston's People's History Project. This position requires strong research, analysis, and creative skills to write new content and disseminate the existing collection.

The Social Researcher will:

- Utilize campus and local archives to research and investigate stories and histories of social resistance, movements and struggles in the Kingston and Queen's communities
- Write both full-length and shorter poster excerpts narrating the context, history, impact and legacies of these movements and struggles
- Digitize and disseminate available collections on social media, our website, student journals and radios (experience with graphic design and digital media an asset)
- Coordinate with local and campus artists to prepare art-based representations of the stories researched for a larger colouring book project
- Support the OPIRG Coordinator by assisting with regular OPIRG communications, holding office hours, etc.
- Carry out other duties as required

The ideal candidate is someone with:

- Passion for local Kingston and Queen's communities and their histories of activism and struggles for justice
- Knowledge of, and excited by the prospect of working on social and environmental justice issues; an understanding of the principles of anti-oppression in alignment with OPIRG Kingston's values
- Knowledge and experience with new media production (graphic design, digital audio editing, etc.), dissemination (social media, print and website) and taking on feedback
- Strong interpersonal, collaborative, and active listening skills
- An ability to communicate stories and histories into engaging narratives for the Kingston and Queen's communities
- Strong organizational and time-management skills
- Experience, or a desire to gain experience in working with archives
- The ability to take initiative and work independently with minimal supervision, asking for clarification when necessary
